GREAT EXPECTATIONS

We have seen a gradual culture shift over the past 30 years, and it's becoming more and more prevalent with each passing year. The culture being referred to is the fast-tracking of our children. Academics have become accelerated and in addition, children are overloaded with lessons, leagues and extracurricular activities, including playdates and parties every weekend. All this is associated with the obsessive fear of adults that children will not compete in the world and find their success. This session discusses the unexpected outcomes of such pressure as well as what we can do to dial back the expectations we needlessly place on our children.
